This seminar is designed as a core course for graduate students in anthropology, graduate students in other fields, and advanced undergraduates who have an interest in social theory and anthropology. The course explores the major scholarly questions and conversations in the history of anthropology in order to inform students' understandings of contemporary texts. Questions include: How do societies cohere or change? What is the relationship between the individual and the society? How do we understanding other societies in our language but in their terms? Conversations include debates over determinism (for example, idealism versus materialism), the ontological status of culture, and the role political and economic power in shaping subjectivities. Given our time limitations, we cannot cover every aspect of anthropological theory. As one result, students are encouraged to explore in their papers areas either areas of theoretical interest that we did not discuss, or applications of the theoretical perspectives we did cover to the analysis of contemporary ethnographic writing.

In order to facilitate our discussion, starting with week 2, each Tuesday by 2 PM, each student will have framed and written a well thought out question or comments for discussion related to the week's readings and posted this question on the course Blackboard site under Discussion. Then, by Wednesday at 2 pm, each student will have posted a response to at least one of the questions posted the day earlier. In addition, pairs of students will lead class discussion in each session, and their joint posting will contain a more extensive list of questions and points for discussion.

You will each write two short “response essays,” of 3-4 (typed, double-spaced) pages. For each of two weeks of your choosing, write an essay about some of the ideas, claims, arguments, and findings found in the readings. You might explore methods, take issue with claims, or relate the readings to other work with which you are familiar. You should not undertake outside reading or research in order to write these essays. You should support your argument(s) with specific references to the text. The first must be posted on Blackboard by September 21th, the second by October 26th. The third and final paper must be a 10 page double spaced AAA style paper that brings together some aspect of theory that we have discussed in class and some body of data that is presented and analyzed in one or more author’s works, or which is original data you have collected and/or repurposed for this analysis. You will post the paper on Blackboard by December 9, 5 pm.
